

About Time – 2013

Written & directed by Richard Curtis

I believe About Time embodies three unifying concepts that subconsciously run throughout the film and identify themselves at different moments in the story.

The first, and probably the most powerful, is love, both in romantic form and in the bonds of family. The film portrays love as the truest and most enduring source of happiness, something that gives meaning to every moment of life even the icky.

The second theme is the idea that timing is not everything. While the story often pursues the “perfect” moment, the film reminds us that time is inevitably always passing and often fleeting. What matters is not controlling time but making the most of the moments we are given.

Finally, the third concept is noticing the beauty in the mundane. By learning to appreciate small details in life. The film shows that our attention shapes our experiences, and how you choose to view the mundane is ultimately optional yet the mundane is also necessary.
