Why I chose Music, Media and Film Foundations: Entertainment and Media History?

From a young age, I was drawn to creative expression and reaction, and over the years I've explored this passion through photography, videography, and listening to music. My background in photography—both in practice and through Algonquin's photography program—helped me understand the power of visual storytelling. I see this course to deepen my understanding of how media, film, and entertainment shape culture and history. Since these industries have always influenced my creative outlook, I want to explore them from both a practical and historical perspective.

What impact has the different forms of media in entertainment world has had in the past and has today on culture?

Different forms of media film, television, music, radio, print, video games, and digital platforms have shaped and continue to shape our culture. The impacts are arguably endless from simply entertainment and creative expression to practical learning, distribution of information, development of individual psychology.

What influence has images had/have on each different area of media (tv, radio, film, music) photography or images touch every form of media and plays a big part in the way that we receive all media. From album covers and movie posters to adverts images are an important part of media.

What is the importance of media in society?

Media is important in society because it keeps people informed about what is happening in the world, helps shape public opinion, and connects communities through shared information and experiences. It acts as a watchdog by holding those in power accountable, while also promoting cultural understanding and spreading new ideas. Media provides education, entertainment, and a platform for communication, making it essential for a healthy, aware, and engaged society.

How does world of media impact your daily life?

I am constantly wearing earphones and I'm either listening to music or podcasts. I like to learn about history through documentaries and film. I am a big fan of video essay style videos and learning about writing and movie production. In terms of music, it's a big part of me and its diverse but top 3 genres would be indie, rock, blues, but there are also moods within the genre like reflective, calm, upbeat. I like books Aswell top 3 books, man's search for meaning, 12 rules for life, the gulag archipelago. My top 3 movies currently, about time, into the wild, beautiful boy. Photography was my first recognisable interest and with interest comes investment of time and that comes with competence I kind of stumbled into around 10.

Has Media fragmented society or its audience? If so, How? Why?

Yes, media has fragmented society and its audience by giving people endless choices and highly personalized streams of information. Instead of sharing a common set of facts, individuals now consume content that aligns with their interests and beliefs, especially through social media algorithms that create echo chambers where users mostly see opinions they already agree with. This environment makes misinformation spread more easily and contributes to deep political divides. Recent politics shows this clearly people on different sides often rely on completely different news sources and social media networks, leading to conflicting views on issues like elections, public health, and government policy. As a result, media fragmentation has made it harder for society to find common ground. This trend seems to be exponential.

Have images shaped the world of media and society? How do you use the world of images?

Absolutely, images have profoundly shaped media and society, influencing how we perceive reality, culture, and identity. Iconic photographers like Ansel Adams, Kate Moss (as a subject and cultural icon in fashion photography), and Henri Cartier-Bresson have demonstrated the power of a single image to evoke emotion, tell stories, and define eras. For me, as a photographer, this influence is personal/ I first encountered Ansel Adams' work at nine, and his breathtaking landscapes made me realize the impact of composition, light, and storytelling through images. Similarly, Cartier-Bresson's candid street photography showed me how ordinary moments could carry extraordinary meaning, while iconic fashion imagery featuring figures like Kate Moss highlighted how photography shapes cultural ideals and trends.

Has the speed of different forms of media changed our intake of information? If so, how?

Yes, over time platforms like YouTube have shifted toward faster pacing, quick cuts, and highly engaging visuals to hold viewers' attention, training audiences to expect information delivered rapidly. Social media accelerated this even further starting with Vine's six-second videos, continuing through Instagram's short reels, and now TikTok's ultra-fast clips and looping content. Even advertisements have become shorter, punchier, and more stimulating to match these platforms' style. This constant exposure to fast, bite-sized content has shaped society's attention span, making people less patient with long-form media and more accustomed to instant, high-speed bursts of information.
